

Shopping for a Comfortable Recliner

Ever wondered why Grandpa's recliner is still the favorite furniture in the house even if it's now old and rickety, or even if it has lost its aesthetic appeal? Well, sometimes, beauty is not everything. It's what's inside that counts. For a recliner, comfort is what makes it more appealing.

Now, what makes a recliner comfortable? Typically every part of the recliner contributes to its overall comfort. So when you decide to buy a recliner, fabric or leather recliner alike, you should inspect every nook and cranny. Make sure that everything is in its right place and that every part is made exactly the way it should be.

Frame

Every good furniture starts with a quality frame. A quality frame should be durable and can support your weight. Try asking the type of wood that was used for the frame of your recliner. Hardwoods are one of the best frames that you can have.

Also try to see how thick the frame is. Opt for thicker frames since they are usually more durable and strong.

Cushion

The type of cushion contributes a big chunk in your recliner's overall comfort. You can choose a recliner based on the degree of comfort you want. If you're buying one for medical purposes, you can opt for an air or gel cushion. If you're looking for a regular recliner, you can choose between a fiber or foam cushion. Memory foam cushions are popularly used today, even for medical recliners, since they can easily mold into the shape of your body, which relieves your body of pressure, thus increasing comfort.

Upholstery

Recliners are available in leather and fabric upholstery. If you're looking forward to get a leather recliner, aniline is one of the best choices since it's naturally finished. This will provide added comfort since this type of leather is "butterfly soft". Genuine leather upholstery gives long lasting elegance to your home décor.

If you're looking for a fabric recliner, a great choice of upholstery would be microfiber. This type of fabric is very easy to clean and more durable than other fabric types.

Recliner Mechanism

Since you're looking for recliners, its mechanism is very important. This part is going to move very often so it will get the most wear. To make sure that the recliner will last, there is no better way than to test it out. Try to recline on it several times to make sure that the mechanism is working well.

Size

To get the most comfort out of a recliner, it is very important to choose one that goes with your body size. Try to see if the head is too high or if the footrest is too low. Getting the right recliner size will promise years of relaxation ahead.
